To Whom It May Concern... My name is Brooks Thompson. I run the macro sales team for Bank of America in Asia Pacific. I've been Tiffany Soerianto's boss for the last 3 years and am very pleased to write a letter of recommendation on her behalf. Tiffany has been an absolute pleasure to work with these past few years and is one of the most thoughtful, ambitious and original thinkers I've ever met. She has an unbelievable level of curiosity and passion for whatever is put in front of her. She will be a tremendous credit to any school that gets her.

Tiffany has set herself apart from the beginning. Honestly, just getting an interview for a front office job at a leading bank would have been a long shot. The vast majority of interns we get every year come from a small handful of top 10 MBA programs in the US and Europe, and the top 5 or so campuses in India, China and Singapore. Tiffany was an undergraduate applying from the Hong Kong Polytechnic University, not really a school we typically recruit from. She impressed throughout the summer and ended up sitting next to me in Hong Kong on the emerging market rates sales desk. Tiffany immediately impressed everyone on the trading floor with her intelligence, drive and willingness to put in the work. She was always one of the first to arrive and the last to leave, fully committing to her work and the team.

Tiffany has never been afraid to ask questions, challenge assumptions and change processes she saw as lacking. Soon after starting, she created an algorithm for sorting through our missed trades, which hadn't been getting accounted for properly. To this day, she continues to approach me with strong ideas for improving systems and reducing inefficiency. She quickly met some of my own clients and made them her own, impressing clients in HK and Singapore as well as from London and even Helsinki. The level of clients she covered were very sophisticated, and she was many years ahead of schedule in being able to cover them.

About a year after she started, Tiffany invited me to a dinner of her 'mentors', myself and two other people that had been instrumental for her. I was absolutely shocked when I reached the dinner and found the long time Asia CEO of a Big 5 accounting firm and the CFO of one of Hong Kong's preeminent real estate development companies at the table. I still have no idea how a 23yr old from a poor Indonesian village with no family connections had met these two business power hitters, and I was even more impressed that both of them took time out to have dinner with us on a random Tuesday evening.

Tiffany has continued to excel in her seat, achieving consistent high ratings. However, I knew also she was getting more and more drawn to machine leaning and artificial intelligence. This past summer, she pulled me in to an office and told me she wanted to quit. She theatrically poured out a big of dozens of notebooks, explaining she was using all of her non-work hours to brush up on the mathematical equations that filled the pages. One of our global sales heads was in Hong Kong the following week and I made sure that she met Tiffany to see if there was anything meaningful we could find for her internally. She was completely impressed meeting Tiffany and hearing her story. I felt quite proud that she was on my team.

Ultimately, Tiffany convinced us that she really did need to go back to school to further her learning, though we convinced her to stay a few more months at the bank. It's been a pleasure to get to know her, and there's more to her than I've been able to cover in this letter. Come prepared with a lot of questions when you interview her!

Sincerely,

Brooks Thompson
